A School of Carving.

Everyone who dines regards carving as a fine art, and, like other fine arts, it has many amorous and diletantish, many who practice it perfunctorily and languidly, and a select few who grasp the knife and fork with true artistic instinct and trained dexterity, and slice the dinner cold and hot, with such a precision of touch, as must make even the most minute baked meats grateful that in death they are so gracefully divided. With what agony and apprehension the expectant carver is watched by the board of expectant diners-out. How the well-bred dinner-tables shudder at the results from the spatter of gravy, the leakage of water from the glass he carries in his frantic efforts to divide the dinner, and the sarcastic gourmets on yonder board who will take a small slice of meat from a plate, and not the entire dinner. But, in the consideration of the pleasure which attaches to the exercise and the annoyance of the following outlets it is a wonder that it should not sooner be demanded that it should be taught like other arts and that its practice should be limited to experts. It is amazing that we go so from week to week and year to year watching our jolly bird-hacked pieces-meal and our moffleive fowls torn limb from limb by mad strength, and the cracking bones and flesh in unsightly scalds following the diminutive platter and straining the snowy expanse of tablecloth.

In families where dining is not a luxury consequent on the recent acquisition of wealth, there frequently linger traditions of carving as a fine art which survive from the days when the hostess herself did not dream to assume this most important function of the table. But to the mass of people who dine the science of carving is unknown, and nothing better illustrates the rapid progress which New York is making toward the highest plane of civilization than the fact that certain of her liberal and cultured citizens propose to establish in the near future a school of carving, where the art and mystery of slicing the bonesless cold flesh and disjointing and desecrating the appetizing fowl may be learned with a precision equal to the like of these.

In a high so favorable at the metropolis a school of carving conducted on anything like rational principles must be an immense success, and the thirst for learning will soon spread all over the broad land until men and women of the most sensitive natures and most delicate appetites will no longer refuse invitations to dinner for fear of getting the digestion impaired or their good clothes ruined by the slashing of the untaught master.

The Death Penalty.

Frankfort, Tenn., Provisions for the adoption of a penitentiary system in Kentucky, the death penalty was consequently introduced into every state of the Union. As a matter of history, and of general interest at this time, we give below a list of punishments in these states committed in the last 50 years previous to 1790.

Treason. Death by burning, without benefit of clergy.

Slaves on pain of death or奴隸制の懲罰. Death.

Murder, by cutting off the tongue, cutting out the eye, etc., and adding to the death.

Killing a person in a duel. Death.

FELINE DEVELOPMENT.

It seems to me from the many articles I meet with in scientific journals as well as in the general press, and from my own observations, too, that the cat family are constantly growing in the general estimation in the high qualities of sagacity and affection. In fact, I believe they stand better than they did forty years ago—all the oblations of Mrs. Swisselm, the champion cat-hater, to the contrary notwithstanding. Hero is our "Nig," for instance, manifesting a trait altogether new, as it seems to me—in this: he likes to ride as well as a coach dog. He cries almost every day to ride to town in the buggy, and is always ready to go out with the team when we are hauling in hay or grain or husking corn, provided he can ride. If one will hold him in his arms he also delights to ride on horseback. His pleasure is manifest in a remarkable degree whenever he is allowed the luxury of a ride, either in any kind of vehicle or on horseback, and his cries are altogether pitiful when he is told that he cannot go. This singular habit seems to have been a natural one with him, for he never had any special training in that direction. While cats are ordinarily frightened out of their wits by any attempt to give them such a ride, our "Nig" is never so happy as when he is thus indulged.—American Naturalist.

AN OARSMAN'S STROKE.

So far the action of the muscles essentially concerned in the performance of the "stroke" have been considered. There are muscles concerned in the supplemental actions, viz.: Those concerned in the performance of respiration. Seated at the stern of an eight-oar, one notices that the frequency of the respiratory act is directly proportional to the quickness of the stroke. At an ordinary paddle the respirations will be about twenty-eight per minute, as compared with the normal frequency, eighteen to twenty, observed when the individuals are taking ordinary walking exercise. On quickening the respirations increase in frequency, but loss in depth, and at racing pace often amount to thirty-six and thirty-eight per minute. Inspiration is effected in the act of "rowing forward," the breath is held during the stroke and there is a sudden expiration between the conclusion and the commencement of fresh effort. The full extension of the arms forward of course results considerably in the expansion of the chest; while the abdominal muscles contract in order to steady the contents of that cavity and prevent the undue propulsion downward by the descent of the diaphragm. Expiration is effected chiefly by the result of these forces, the tension being heightened by the breath being held during the stroke, and also by the action of the internal intercostal muscles, whose action in cases of extraordinary respiratory effort is about one-fourth more powerful than that of the external intercostals, the muscles of inspiration. Expansory too, as we have already stated, is materially aided by bringing the handle of the oar to the chest. Rowing is a very important part of the stroke for the "finish" is nearly of equal importance as the "stroke." If contraction of the lungs commences too soon, then the stroke is not carried out, it deferred too late, the contraction is too vehement, and the oar is projected with a jerk. While the oar is being raised to the chest the oarsman, in this action of the postural muscles, should be brought well to the side. Violent contraction of the flexor muscles, however, is not desirable, however, as tendency to bring the oar out of the water with a jerk.

Violent contraction of the flexor muscles, however, is gained by bringing the arms sharply and closely to the side at the end of the stroke; it aids the respiratory act. Experiments on the dead body clearly show that when artificial respiration is performed according to Sylvester's method more air can be forced out of the chest when the arms are brought firmly and closely to the side at the end of the stroke, than when the experimenter is simply contented with raising and depressing them. The stroke is now at an end, and two subsidiary actions have to be performed before its commencement—the drawing forward the slide, and extension of the feather. The former is almost instantaneously performed by a vigorous and powerful contraction of the hamstring muscles—muscles which before the introduction of the slide were comparatively idle. The slide therefore has introduced more work into the stroke, and, indeed, may also be considered to be a third action.—Medical
